Who amongst us shall be crowned? It is up to all who dwell in the County of Humboldt. The most humble subjects at North Coast Journal are taking votes for the best in the land. That is the question posed by NCJ's 2018 Best of Humboldt Readers Poll: Who treats you like royalty? Which people, places, and things shall be deemed the best?

Voting ends Sat. June 30

Here's how Best of Humboldt works:

ROUND II RULES: You can vote for as many or as few subcategories as you like, and you can vote every day from June 4 to June 30. (But just once a day!) Most of the categories have the top three nominees to choose from, but a few have ties. We need you to break those ties!

So how do we make sure there's no cheating or robo-voting? You'll have to make an account and confirm your email, but it's super quick and easy, we promise! This year's system has been redesigned to be easier to use than ever. All hail to the best!

Kindercamps

Editor:

While The President's new executive order may temporarily stop some of the child separations of those seeking asylum in this country, it is clear it will not stop all of them ("Dozens Turn Out to Protest Child Detention Immigration Policies," posted June 22). Nor is there any assurance that all of the children already separated will ever be reunited with their parents, many of whom have already been deported back to the countries (mostly in Central America) from which they fled.

The U.S government does assign a number to each child at the time of separation. As far as I know, they are not yet tattooing these numbers on their forearms.

Fabulous Exit, Melania

Editor:

Melania, I don't think we will be hearing much from you in the future.

How do you fire the First Lady? Ship her off to Elba?

"I Really Don't Care, Do U?" I think I understand this "cryptic" message on your jacket which, once you think about it, is not at all cryptic.

When it comes from you, Melania, the unspoken message is the same as it would be for any hip young fashion fan who chose to wear that jacket.

It gives voice to that nasty thought held secretly in common among all racists.

Melania, your statement exposes the dirt and throws it back in their faces. It says, "Shame on you, if you think this way."

About KHSU

Editor:

In response to the last letter regarding KHSU, those of us who were at the Community Advisory Board meeting know that this is not about Katie Whiteside alone, but the new policies of removing the local programming from the community station.

Katie was the canary in the mine shaft ... The new General Manager, Peter Fretwell, was hired to clean house. His work history is available. He originates from Spokane, Washington, and was working in much different communities from ours. His fundamentalist Christian background and work experience will demonstrate that he is a square peg here. What needs to happen is a community takeover of the station. Can we do this? The Blue Ox housed its station. The BBC was originally housed in Sunnybrae.

I hope you all attend the next Community Advisory Board meeting, the last Wednesday of the month.

Banned for Life

State commission imposes lifetime hunting and fishing ban on former harbor commissioner; attorney calls action a publicity stunt

By Thadeus Greenson

thad@northcoastjournal.com

The California Fish and Game Commission voted unanimously in closed session June 20 to permanently ban former Humboldt Bay Harbor, Conservation and Recreation District Commissioner and current Humboldt County Civil grand juror Aaron Newman from obtaining a recreational hunting or fishing license.

The commission's action is rare. According to California Department of Fish and Wildlife spokesman Clark Blanchard, the commission only approves lifetime bans once or twice a year. Newman's attorney, Paul Brisso, meanwhile, told the Journal he went back through two and a half year's worth of the commission's agendas and couldn't find a single time it had taken a similar action banning someone from recreational hunting and fishing.

"I think it's pretty unfortunate," said Brisso, who serves as the Harbor District's attorney but represented Newman in a private capacity. "I think he has kind of gotten railroaded by the Fish and Game Commission and really the Department of Fish and Wildlife."

But filings in the case show the California Department of Fish and Wildlife, which initiated the action, argued it was a necessary step to protect the state's natural resources from a man with a history of troubling accusations.

The ban stems from a 2014 criminal case in which Newman, a prominent local commercial fisherman, faced allegations that he'd habitually poached abalone and lied to a state agency about it. He ultimately pleaded guilty to three misdemeanor charges, including unlawfully obtaining more than one license in a year, lying to a state agency and failing to properly tag abalone. Two felony perjury charges were dismissed as a part of the plea deal.

Newman was sentenced to three years probation in the case, a period during which he was prohibited from possessing or obtaining a recreational fishing or hunting license by special order of the court. But both Newman's probation and the prohibition have since terminated, which prompted the California Department of Fish and Wildlife to file an accusation with the commission against Newman seeking a lifetime ban. In November, Newman successfully petitioned the court to have his convictions dismissed, essentially expunging them from his record.

Newman, a sitting harbor commissioner at the time, was arrested in June of 2013 after California Fish and Wildlife wardens searched his house and reported finding evidence that he'd poached abalone and a deer as part of what one prosecutor dubbed a "systemic" pattern of behavior stemming back at least a decade.

Abalone fishing is tightly regulated in California and the commission made the unprecedented decision in December to shut down the entire 2018 recreational season amid a rapid decline in the shellfish's numbers due to what scientists are calling a "perfect storm" of ecological conditions. (See "Plight of the Abalone," March 8.)

To legally harvest the mollusks during regular years, one is required to first acquire a permit, known as an abalone report card, which comes with 24 tags. When an abalone is harvested, state law requires that it must be immediately marked with one of the tags, limiting a person to harvesting no more than two dozen of them in a single season.

According to records in Newman's case, he filed a sworn affidavit with Fish and Wildlife back in 2009 claiming he lost his report card after harvesting only three abalone. But when wardens searched his home, they found evidence that he'd harvested 21 before applying for the new replacement card. More troubling, a Fish and Wildlife investigation found Newman filed 11 affidavits with the state between 2003 and 2012 claiming to have lost his abalone report cards during the season, while no one else in the state sought replacement cards more than twice during the same period.

Aaron Newman.

During the search, wardens also reported finding evidence that Newman submitted documents to the state in September of 2012 claiming to have lost his B-Zone deer tag before using it and requesting a replacement, when in fact he'd used the tag on a 4-point buck just eight days earlier.

Newman challenged the Fish and Wildlife accusation seeking to permanently revoke his recreational hunting and fishing privileges and the matter was heard by an administrative law judge, who penned the proposed decision that was ultimately approved by the Fish and Game Commission last week.

In the decision, Judge Ed Washington notes that Newman argued that the deer tag incident was a simple mistake, that he'd lost a X3B zone deer tag and meant to get a replacement but inadvertently received a replacement B-Zone tag instead. When he realized his error, he said he was too embarrassed to return the tag and admit it. When it comes to the abalone, Newman admitted he "was not fully aware" of some tagging requirements and improperly stored some untagged. But he argued that all those lost cards were really lost — left in friends' trucks, washed out to sea or stolen. Additionally, according to the decision, he argued that since he'd already been punished by the criminal court, he shouldn't be punished again by the commission.

Washington and the commission were unmoved.

"[Newman] is a commercial fisherman with approximately 20 years of experience," the decision states. "He has obtained multiple duplicate sport fishing and hunting licenses during that period and should be well aware of the requirements for sport fishing, hunting and replacing lost fishing and hunting licenses and permits. Respondent's explanations for his criminal activities were neither credible nor persuasive when considered with all the evidence presented at hearing. The evidence established that his criminal offenses were committed intentionally, knowingly or recklessly."

Further, the decision states that the goal of the lifetime ban is not to punish Newman but to "protect the public and protect California's at-risk fish and wildlife" and that Newman has demonstrated himself incapable of responsibly exercising the privileges granted by hunting and fishing licenses.

Speaking to the Journal, Brisso said a Department of Fish and Wildlife officer misrepresented Newman's record to the commission, erroneously claiming he had pleaded guilty to giving false information to get duplicate abalone cards. Further, Brisso said, the commission's action is grossly disproportionate to the conduct his client was convicted of, noting that state regulations provide that if violating four hunting or trapping statutes in a five-year period typically results in a three-year ban. Discretionary permanent revocation of licenses only comes into play, Brisso said, when you look at offenses like "using a tracking device for hunting bears to sell body parts" or "knowingly taking a big game animal."

Brisso alleged the Department of Fish and Wildlife was essentially trophy hunting, going after Newman because of his high profile as a former elected official, a representative of various fishing organizations and someone who was actively involved in the state's Marine Life Protection Act agreements.

"I think they're out to generate publicity for themselves, for their enforcement division," he said. "It's something where they know they can generate a lot of publicity in taking an action like this."

Newman was elected to the harbor commission in 2011 and served a four-year term before opting not to seek re-election. A message left on his cell phone seeking comment for this story was not returned by deadline.

Meanwhile, Newman is finishing up his term on the Humboldt County Grand Jury, which included serving on the jail, public works and law and justice committees, according to information provided by the county.

The grand jury is charged with investigating local government agencies and serves as "an ombudsman for citizens of the county" with the authority to explore citizen complaints concerning public officials, according to its website.

Each year, the panel releases a series of reports, which in the past have included investigations into late-night jail releases and the state of the county's Child Welfare System.

To be selected, prospective jurors need to fill out an application (a request for Newman's was denied by the Humboldt County Superior Court, which cited confidentiality), with questions that include: "Are you of average intelligence and of sound judgment and good character?" and "Have you ever been convicted of malfeasance in office or any felony or other high crime?"

The court system is currently looking at whether to perform background checks on candidates.

Applications are reviewed for "statutory disqualifications, qualifications, interest, experience and availability" and those selected to proceed go through a two-step interview process, according to the court's response to a series of questions about the procedure.

Newman and the rest of the panel were then selected in a random drawing by Presiding Judge Joyce Hinrichs. This year, 24 people applied to serve on the 19-member grand jury, which usually also includes five members from the previous year.

While Newman was an elected official at the time of his arrest, his conviction does not meet the definition of "malfeasance in office" because the offenses were not directly tied to his role as a public official, according to David Levine, a professor at University of California Hastings School of Law.

The term "higher crime," Levine says, applies to felonies while Newman pleaded guilty to misdemeanors.

That being said, Levine noted, Newman's appointment to the grand jury may not go against the letter of the law but he says it's a questionable selection given "how close the violation was to his duties in office."

"It's certainly a judgment issue, even if he was eligible," Levine said.

The Fish and Game Commission's action is the last step in a state administrative process, meaning Newman's only recourse would be to seek a writ of mandate from a state judge finding that the commission had abused its discretion in approving the ban. Brisso said Newman is still evaluating his options moving forward.

Day-Wilson Out as Eureka's City Attorney

After seven tumultuous years, Eureka and Day-Wilson agree to a 'mutual parting'

By Thadeus Greenson, Linda Stansberry and Kimberly Wear

newsroom@northcoastjournal.com

The Eureka City Council "received and accepted" the resignation of City Attorney Cyndy Day-Wilson on Tuesday after a hastily called closed session meeting to discuss the potential firing or discipline of an employee.

In making the announcement, Mayor Frank Jager thanked Day-Wilson for her service, saying the separation was effective immediately and includes a yet-to-be-finalized resignation agreement.

After the meeting convened Tuesday, without Day-Wilson present, the council talked in closed session for about 20 minutes before City Manager Greg Sparks emerged and asked Larry Kluck, an attorney representing Day-Wilson, to talk in his office.

Sparks said later that he and Kluck were discussing the terms of the agreement, which he said will be made available once the arrangement was "formalized." Asked when that might be, the city manager said he didn't have a time line but it should be "soon."

Kluck was not immediately available for comment.

Tuesday's meeting came exactly a week after the council met in closed session to review Day-Wilson's job performance. Sparks described Day-Wilson's exit as a "mutual parting," saying her resignation "was offered and accepted" by the council, which was in "consensus" on the matter.

Day-Wilson's last day on the job was Monday.

Contacted after the meeting, council members declined to speak about their decision to part ways with Day-Wilson, who's acted as the city's in-house attorney for seven years.

Asked why the council generally felt it needed a new direction in the city attorney's office, Councilmember Austin Allison wouldn't say much.

"There's so many things — I just don't know if I can say them. I think I can't," he said. "It's a personnel matter, so we have to keep things confidential."

Councilmembers said plans are being made now to make sure Day-Wilson's duties and workload are covered, and possibly to contract with an interim city attorney until the city can determine its next steps.

"Rest assured that it's all under control," Councilmember Marian Brady said.

Allison pointed out that some of the city's larger cases — like its years-long litigation against local landlords Floyd and Betty Squires — are being handled by outside counsel.

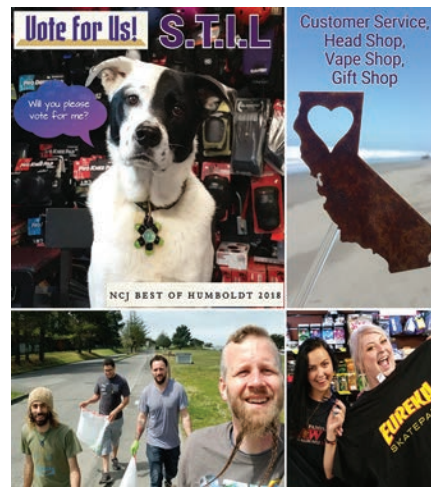

Day-Wilson's seven-year tenure with the city of Eureka was marked by controversy. In 2014, at her direction, the council retracted and watered down a letter of apology to the Wiyot Tribe for Eureka's involvement in the 1860 massacre of women and children. That same year she was accused of lying to councilmembers about — and attempting to bully city hall employees into covering up — a breach of confidential information.

From 2014 through 2017 Day-Wilson led a lengthy and expensive court battle against the North Coast Journal to prevent the disclosure of dash camera footage of a Eureka police officer allegedly assaulting a juvenile. In 2016 she drew the public ire of a city councilmember for allegedly refusing to agendize a shelter crisis declaration. That same year, she refused to comply with this paper's California Public Records Act request and publicly accused the Journal of conspiring to aid an American Civil Liberties Union lawsuit. And last year, she signed off on a press release that included an unsubstantiated accusation that a local landlord had traded promises of lodging for sexual favors.

She also proposed and oversaw the transition of Eureka's elections to a "true ward" system and changed the city's public records act request policy, dictating that all requests go through her office.

Day-Wilson started her career with the city in 2011 after specializing in environmental law for the firm Best, Best &

Krieger LLP in San Diego. According to her LinkedIn profile, she obtained her doctorate from the University of Idaho in 1986, going on to earn an advanced law degree from George Washington University in 1996.

Under the terms of Day-Wilson's employment agreement with the city, she answered directly to the city council, which could opt to terminate her employment at any time, with or without cause. According to that agreement, if fired without cause, Day-Wilson would have been owed a lump sum cash severance equal to six months of salary and benefits, as well as any accrued vacation, holiday or executive leave time. According to the database of public employee salaries www.transparent-california.com, Day-Wilson's total compensation in 2016, the last year for which data is available, was $218,678, meaning her severance pay would have fallen somewhere in the neighborhood of $110,000.

To fire Day-Wilson with cause under the employment agreement, the council would have had to show she willfully breached the terms of the agreement, habitually neglected her duties, committed a crime, willfully violated city policies of a "serious nature" or committed an act of "dishonesty, fraud or other acts of moral turpitude." The agreement further provides that the council would have had to notify Day-Wilson in advance of its intent to fire her with cause and given her the opportunity to argue against the action during a public hearing.

The last time Eureka's city attorney position was vacant, local attorney Bill Bragg filled the role in an interim capacity for about a year until Day-Wilson was hired in November of 2011.

While Allison declined to look back and comment on Day-Wilson's tenure with the city, he was willing to look forward.

"While we start to work on recruitment efforts for another city attorney, I think all the council members have their own wishes and goals," he said. "Mine would be to find someone who is as forward thinking and motivated as the rest of city staff — there's a lot of positive energy going on and I'd love to find someone who can share that energy moving forward."

Permit Patty and Why Everything Must Go

By Thadeus Greenson

thad@northcoastjournal.com

If you've passed a cannabis dispensary in Humboldt recently, you've probably seen the brightly colored signs offering discounts of up to 80 percent. Dispensaries throughout the state have shifted into an everything-must-go, clearance-sale mindset, offering a last chance to buy potentially tainted weed at rock-bottom prices.

As of July 1, all cannabis products sold in California must be tested for pesticides and contaminants under the state's new regulatory framework and the grace period — during which dispensaries could sell untested products they purchased prior to Jan. 1 — will come to an end. So dispensaries are scurrying to clear their shelves before July 1, after which the products have to be destroyed, according to the state Bureau of Cannabis Control.

That means customers who trust their retailers or are simply willing to gamble with their health have less than a week to stock up on cheap weed. And after July 1, well, it's unclear exactly what will be available, as some are predicting that a bottleneck at testing facilities will lead to a shortage on the shelves and, consequently, some higher prices. Locally, most dispensaries are indicating that they have lines on suppliers and distributors and don't expect much disruption, though they concede there may be temporary shortages of specific products.

Remember all that hype a couple of weeks back about looming federal legalization ("Plenty of Canni, No Fest," June 14)?

Well, you can go ahead and exhale. Maybe it's because our neighbors to the north beat us to the punch — Thanks, Justin — but the much hyped, bipartisan STATES Act has done nothing since being introduced. Well, that is, nothing other than being stymied by congressional party leadership.

The bill — which, introduced by Sens. Elizabeth Warren (D-Massachusetts) and Cory Gardner (R-Colorado), would essentially end federal prohibition by removing cannabis from the federal Controlled Substances Act and letting states decide the issue for themselves — needs to get through committee hearings before making it to the Senate floor. But Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), who chairs the key Senate Judiciary Committee, has no plans to entertain cannabis bills and hasn't set it for a hearing. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Kentucky) very recently said he opposes federal legislation and is busy pushing his farm bill that would legalize hemp production in the U.S. Even Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-New York), who recently announced he's working on his own decriminalization bill, hasn't yet taken any steps to push the STATES Act forward.

And let's not forget that Congress allegedly has a couple of immigration bills on its plate and a continuing resolution looming at the end of September to keep the government funded, all before midterm elections in November. Plus, any lawmaker with any public profile is going to be endlessly pestered about the cleanliness of the Red Hen, whether Maxine Walters was inciting mob violence and what message exactly Melania was sending with that jacket.

So if you're breathlessly waiting federal movement on cannabis, you might want to stock up on some cheap edibles. It's going to be a while.

In contrast to America's slow, awkward stumble toward cannabis decriminalization, the viral backlash against Permit Patty came swiftly and decisively, leaving a seemingly successful cannabis business in a freefall.

By now you have probably seen the footage on social media or at least read about it: A white woman in San Francisco, later identified as Alison Ettel, appearing to call police on an 8-year-old black girl selling bottles of water near AT&T Park (to help pay for a trip to Disneyland) because the girl didn't have a permit. The memes came fast and fierce and Ettel joined the internet ranks of Barbecue Becky and Starbucks managers.

You might remember Ettel from these pages ("Ruff Trip," Dec. 15), which featured a write-up of her business TreatWell and its line of CBD oils for pets and humans.

The scene between Ettel and the young bottled water entrepreneur began trending the morning of June 23 and by that afternoon critics were calling for a boycott of TreatWell. It seems to have worked, as a number of dispensaries throughout the state have announced they will no longer carry the company's products — despite their popularity — and several of the company's investors announced they were pulling out.

Locally, Heart of Humboldt, a dispensary in Arcata, announced June 25 that, "in light of recent events," it would no longer be purchasing or carrying TreatWell products.

In addition to the obvious racial overtones to this whole scene, from our vantage point in Humboldt County, we also can't help but see a certain irony in a cannabis industry CEO narcing on someone for operating without a permit, only to get ostracized for it.

Tribalism and Polarization

By Bob Froehlich

views@northcoastjournal.com

A Google search of tribalism in America returns 664,000 results with headlines like “The New Tribalism and the Decline of the Nation State” and “Can Our Democracy Survive Tribalism?” Recently, a bounty of new books has arrived with titles like: Political Tribes: Group Instinct and the Fate of Nations and Us Against Them: How Tribalism Affects the Way We Think.

You’ve probably noticed the word appearing more and more often in media communications and personal conversations. In fact, University of California at Berkeley linguistics professor Geoff Nunberg made “tribalism” his choice for 2017 word of the year. “Tribalism” has become the current go-to word when trying to make sense of the increased groupishness in beliefs. This trend is demonstrated by our current scurry to ally with groups, signal our affiliation by forwarding news, gossip and anecdotes that arouse head nods, “likes” and, in some quarters, an occasional “amen.”

Venues for our “affinity groups” (a more social-science term than tribe) can range from the traditional club or local tavern to contemporary meetups on Facebook, Twitter and in the suburbs of subreddits. A search for the words “tribalism” and “polarization” appearing together yields 52,200 hits, so it becomes important to explore the connection between these two current phenomena.

First, I’d like to add the disclaimer that I in no way mean the use of the word tribe to imply any disrespect for the common use of the word as distinguishing one group of indigenous peoples from another. The word has a long history coming from the Latin “tribus,” denoting one of the three political/ethnic divisions of the original Roman state. Wikipedia clarifies the dual use of the word “tribe” by saying, “The word ‘tribe’ can be defined to mean an extended kin group or clan with a common ancestor, or can also be described as a group with shared interests, lifestyles and habits.”

Tribalism is rooted in our evolutionary biology and evolutionary psychology, in tandem with our cultural coevolution and, by fostering cooperation in achieving common goals, is no doubt a principle driver of the success of Homo sapiens. But while tribalism nurtures in-group solidarity, it can also lead to competition and conflict between groups.

For example, our biological evolution has given us and other mammals receptors in various parts of the brain for the hormone oxytocin, best known for increasing maternal behavior. According to Robert Sapolsky, author of the recent book Behave: Biology of Humans at our Best and Worst, the molecule also “makes you more prosocial to people like you (i.e. your teammates) but spontaneously lousy to others who are a threat.” And as some authors have pointed out, while tribalism may have served us well in our early history when our problem-solving related to simpler and more local issues, it can in these more complex times impede our progress in meeting the global challenges that now face us.

In his sketch-book video “The Dangers of Tribalism,” philosopher and podcaster Kevin deLaplante, founder of the Critical Thinker Academy, defines polarization as “a measure of the magnitude of differences between groups.” He goes on to say, “Now there’s an obvious dark side to polarization. It’s not hard to see how increasing polarization in our tribal psychology can lead to serious social and political problems and a distorted perception of the world.”

According to deLaplante, as the gap in attitudes, beliefs and values between groups (tribes) widens, we begin to disagree on more things and disagree more strongly, and then begin thinking that this disagreement represents a deeper flaw in the moral character of members of the other group or represents a basic defect in their ability to see reality for what it really is. At this point, common ground begins to collapse and the motivation to separate (segregate) becomes strong. Concurrent with this distancing from the other group, is a strengthening of our in-group solidarity as a result of having identified a common enemy.

Expressing similar concerns in an NPR interview in April of last year, Georgia State University professor Jennifer McCoy warned that, as democracies become more tribal and more polarized, the various groups begin to no longer see each other as political adversaries coexisting in a healthy democracy but instead view the other as a “threatening enemy to be vanquished,” resulting in a breakdown of negotiations and communication. McCoy has studied polarized democracies in countries like Venezuela, Turkey and Hungary, and worries about the growing distance between political parties and other groups in the U.S.

Philosopher, podcaster and master teacher deLaplante appeared as a guest on the June 6 edition of “Thinking Clearly” — a program about critical thinking and related topics, which airs live on KMUD radio the first Thursday of every month from 7 to 8 p.m.

The podcast version of the show can be downloaded at: thinkingclearly.libsyn.com or using iTunes and other podcast apps. Discussion of the topics of tribalism and polarization will be continued on the July edition of “Thinking Clearly,” which is hosted by myself and Julia Minton. # New Jail Transportation Policy

The Humboldt County Sheriff's Office sent out a press release last week announcing that it has revised its program assisting poor arrestees in getting home after they are released from custody to help them "have a better chance to create a healthy lifestyle upon release."

But the announcement reveals that limited public transportation options and the jail's continued policy of releasing some arrestees in the middle of the night leave some with few options after leaving jail custody.

State law has long required that jails offer transportation assistance, upon request, to any indigent person being released from custody more than 25 miles from where they were arrested. The sheriff's office has arguably complied with that law but it has also refused Humboldt County Grand Jury suggestions to alter its policy by more proactively offering released inmates transportation assistance — which locally comes in the form of bus tickets — rather than just making it available upon request.

The new policy announced this week provides that, prior to being released, inmates will be proactively offered a bus ticket back if they were arrested anywhere outside the "greater Eureka area" — which apparently includes Cutten, Myrtle town and Humboldt Hill — and were booked into custody with "less than $5 and/or (do not) have means to purchase a bus ticket."

Because the cost of a Redwood Transit System bus ticket from Eureka to Southern Humboldt is currently $5.50 — and slated to go up to $6.25 beginning July 1 — we asked the sheriff's office how officials had come up with the $5 threshold and pointing out the $5.50 cost of a ticket to Southern Humboldt.

Sheriff's office spokesperson Samantha Karges responded via email saying the $5 criteria only applies to people arrested within 25 miles of the jail but outside the "greater Eureka area," and adding that the only bus fare pricier than $5 is the Southern Humboldt line.

"If someone needed to ride this bus line, that would mean that they had been arrested over 25 miles away," she wrote. "The less than $5 criteria would not apply to them and that threshold would be assessed based on where they needed to be transported. ... Of course, if rates do increase to the point where $5 is not sufficient to get a bus ticket, we will reassess that threshold and make changes accordingly."

But there's also the fact that not all bus routes run daily. For example, the route out to Willow Creek doesn't run on Sundays. Similarly, the Southern Humboldt route currently doesn't run on Sundays, though seasonal Sunday service will pick up July 1 and run through October. That means

Separation Anxiety

Dozens of people showed up on the Arcata Plaza on June 22 to protest President Donald Trump's now reversed policy of separating immigrants from their minor children at the border. Another protest — the Families Belong Together Rally — is planned for 10 a.m. on June 30 in Eureka's Old Town. Meanwhile, Project Hugs — a community effort to ease the pain and confusion of the separated and detained children — is collecting lightly used stuffed animals in donation bins at Arcata City Hall through June 29 with plans to send the stuffies to detention centers. someone without a dollar to his or her name arrested in Willow Creek and released from jail at 7:30 p.m. Saturday would have to wait some 36 hours — until Monday morning — to use a jail-issued bus pass.

There's also the issue of cash, namely that some people booked into the Humboldt County jail come in with it in their pockets but leave with a check instead. Local buses only accept cash.

CRIMES AGAINST NATURE

Poaching takes its toll on the North Coast By Kimberly Wear kim@northcoastjournal.com

They come at night, under the cover of darkness, traversing the back roads of Redwood National and State Parks, home to much of what remains of the world's last old growth redwood stands.

Carrying chainsaws and wearing headlamps, the thieves often take side trails to scour the towering trunks for knobbed growths that encase intricately patterned wood that can fetch hundreds, if not thousands, of dollars on the unregulated burl market.

Sometimes their cuts are measured, leaving the wounded tree a chance at survival. Other times, the damage is too severe — the hacking slashes marking certain death for the forest giants. In one of the worst documented cases, a 300-year-old tree was cut down just so a poacher could get at a massive burl located 50 feet up its side.

An online search for cut burl slabs shows larger pieces — some 6 feet by 5 feet or 5 feet by 4 feet — going for between $1,000 and $3,000 while smaller ones were around $500 to $2,100 depending on the shape and grain.

Coveted by woodworkers for crafting everything from artisan bowls to clocks and coffee tables, old growth redwood burl can draw a hefty price, but trading in pilfered wood can come with a high cost — not just for a singular tree but also the species' future.

Most commonly found at the base but sometimes occurring higher up, burl is the main way redwoods reproduce — the other being by seed — with the knotty bulbs holding genetic tissue capable of sprouting an exact replica of the parent tree, known as a “clone.”

Sometimes these result in the almost magical production of “fairy rings,” nearly perfect circles of redwoods that share a common heritage — with a potentially 2,000-year-old tree producing an offspring that could go on to live another two millennia before doing the same. Cutting off the burls can interrupt this propagation process and leave the trees vulnerable to disease and infection.

“Redwoods have an amazing strategy to persist in the environment but that's pretty hard to overcome — after a chainsaw gouges into your tissue,” says Leonel Arguello, the park's joint chief of resource management and science. “In significant amounts, that's a pretty difficult thing for an individual tree to recover from.”

Just how many times burl poachers have struck in the park is hard to say. They take care to hide their tracks. But there are at least 16 known poaching sites in the Humboldt County portion of the sprawling 133,000-acre preserve and another dozen or so in the Del Norte section.

“It's terrible. It's super frustrating,” park ranger Stephen Troy says. “The obvious reason, for most people, including myself, is the damage itself can't be undone. There is no fixing what happened to these trees. It's such a unique and valuable resource. There's no other place like it in the world.

“We feel like they're just trying to make a quick buck. ... It's just sad to see such an amazing resource get damaged for something petty,” he adds.

What Troy does know is there most certainly are more poaching locations yet to be found. He says it might sound strange but there's almost a sense of excitement when one comes to their attention. Now, at least, he says, there is a starting point — a chance to hold someone responsible.

“We have a victim, per se,” Troy says.

Then, just like any typical crime scene, an investigation launches, often including surveillance, interviewing potential suspects or witnesses and serving search warrants.

“The big thing for these is having somewhere in the park that we can tie it to,” he says.

Sometimes, if the suspect burl chunk is still relatively whole, matching it back to the damaged tree is as simple as bringing it back to a poaching site to be lined up with the tree like a jigsaw puzzle piece, where it can “fit right back in there because it was so unique,” Troy says.

“You can usually tell right off the bat,” he says.

Other times the pieces have already been cut up or turned in the wood-working process, in which case scientific techniques can be used to tie the two back together.

Zane Moore, a doctorate student in botany at the University of California at Davis, explains that each tree's rings provide a “unique ‘barcode’ or ‘fingerprint’ that is extremely unlikely to match any other tree perfectly.”

“By aligning the tree rings in the burl wood to the suspected tree on National Park property, one could determine without a doubt whether there is a match or not," he says in an email to the Journal. "If there is any doubt, one could look more closely under a microscope (at) the cells that make up any given ring. Looking at those cells and their grain (direction of growth), they should match. This is a good way of 'verification' if the tree rings alone are not convincing."

"The rings on a burl will only match one tree perfectly"

Zane Moore, UC Davis

He notes that the tree ring test works "best in a burl's case, because the shape of the burl (and rings) over time will be unique for every single burl."

"Tree rings whorl around just like a fingerprint and the rings on a burl will only match one tree perfectly," Moore says.

While burl poaching is nothing new, park officials say they've seen an uptick in recent years.

The most recent case was discovered in January during a routine patrol, and ultimately lead to the arrest of an Orick man. Troy says he's limited in what he can say about the case, which has been forwarded to the Humboldt County District Attorney's Office, but he does expect more arrests in connection with the incident, which involved an old growth stump.

Meanwhile, a spate of incidents

On the Cover

in 2013 and 2014 shined an international spotlight on the issue after officials discovered at least 18 cases on park grounds in rapid succession, including the brazen tree felling.

The national media featured pictures of the aftermath, including spreads in the New York Times and National Geographic, with several showing the shocking image of a ranger dwarfed by massive cuts into one trunk that measured some 8 feet high.

Eventually, two men would be sentenced, with one receiving 700 hours of community service and ordered to pay an $11,000 fine. The other received a suspended sentence and three years' probation, according to news reports.

Troy says the onslaught of coverage helped stem the burl poaching tide for a time, but the search is always on. It's an endeavor stymied not only by the immense expanse of the parks but also the fact that the poachers often appear to be familiar with the area and take pains to conceal what they've done.

"It's really hard to know because they don't do anything really immediately apparent," he says. "So, they go off trail and typically do it on the back side of the tree. They take the effort to hide it, so we have the idea that it probably happens more often than we know about."

There is a certain modus operandi the poachers tend to follow: They almost always strike at night but stick close to roads because the bigger burls can weigh hundreds if not thousands of pounds. In some cases, the poachers position themselves uphill, so they can slide the larger ones down to a waiting truck.

Often, they will hit the same tree or redwood stand over and over again until the damage is discovered.

It is, Troy notes, no simple operation. These are people who know how to handle chainsaws under challenging circumstances, in the dark and on uneven terrain, and are able to move large pieces of wood.

"There is a core group of people that we've identified," he says. "There is definitely a core group of people who we are familiar with that are involved with this. Without a doubt."

Arguello says park officials know the "general zone" poachers will target, noting the thieves are not going to walk a mile into the forest to get the burl, but he says that's still not enough.

"It doesn't help in the long run of catching the bad guys and that's what the rangers are faced with — finding the guys that do this work and it's not easy," he says. "Unfortunately, there's no technology, really, to make those detections and have a response quickly. We're a big park."

Woodworker Bernie Korbly, who sells specialty redwood pieces at his shop, Korbly Wood Products in Miranda, agrees. He says it's "bad karma" to use purloined wood and he only buys old stumps from trees felled long ago on private properties directly from the owners.

"Most people I know in the business are very conscious about using wood properly," he says. "There's plenty of wood out there. Why do you have to steal? ... Let's leave the park alone. They're beautiful. Let's not take anything away from them."

Arguello says he favors a chain of custody requirement to track burl "from forest to retail," a system that other countries like Chile have implemented to tackle the illegal trafficking of rare woods.

"If there was something in place, that would be helpful," Arguello says.

The pillaging of wildlife is an ongoing issue not only at Redwood National and State Parks but around the world. A 2016 Interpol and United Nation's Environmental Program report on the illegal trade of natural resources — ranging from deforestation to the killing of endangered species like rhinos to overfishing — called the rise in such practices "astonishing."

"Environmental crime has impacts beyond those posed by regular criminality. It increases the fragility of an already brittle planet," the report states. "The resulting vast losses to our planet rob future generations of wealth, health and well-being on an unprecedented scale."

While many of the worst offenses take place in developing countries, the United States — and by extension the North Coast — is not immune. On the East Coast, for example, ginseng root is under siege in the Appalachians while the Venus fly trap — which only grows naturally in the wild in a small portion of South and North Carolina — is also threatened.

Closer to home, the California Department of Fish and Wildlife announced this month that a trio of international plant smugglers pleaded guilty to stealing thousands of succulents from local seaside cliffs to sell on the Asian market.

Meanwhile, abalone poaching is a constant scourge that is only likely to increase in the region with the closure of this year’s recreational season due to a dire plunge in the sought-after shellfish’s population, caused by what scientists are calling a “perfect storm” of ecological conditions most likely related to climate change.

Among the most frustrating aspects of burl poaching, Arguello notes, is not only the destruction left behind but the fact that it’s completely unnecessary considering the sustainable harvesting options available.

In the mid-1850s, some 2 million acres of old growth redwood forests stretched along the coast between Monterey and the Oregon border, according to the park. Today, less than 5 percent remains with most of the original stands now protected inside national and state parks in California.

“People are stealing from a World Heritage resource and leaving behind a disfigured tree,” Arguello says. “It’s just wrong. These resources do not belong to individuals, they belong to all of us. That is why we set them aside.” ●

Tips for Hungry Backpackers

Keep it light (but keep the wine)

By Louisa Rogers

tabletalk@northcoastjournal.com

Lucky us. We who live in Humboldt County have not one but four wilderness areas in which to play: the Marbles, the Trinities, the Russian Wilderness and the Lost Coast. Breathtaking as they are, though, if you haven't brought the right food, you'll be too tired or hungry to enjoy their beauty.

Back in the '70s, when I first went backpacking with my then-boyfriend, we carried a heavy pot, metal bowls and cans of chili. You heard that right. Cans. There was no other choice. I can still remember Barry stamping on the empty can to flatten it before burying it deep in the ground.

Forty years later, we're still backpacking. Times have changed, though. Now we carry lightweight backpacks and sleeping bags; a UV water purifier (not iodine, which took 30 minutes to sterilize the water); a Whisperlite cooking stove; and a titanium pot. Since we're in our 60s and 70s, we have to pay attention to how much weight we carry or our knees and ankles will pay for it. Plus, we're more agile with lighter packs.

On the other hand, we don't want to feel deprived. Treats feel particularly well deserved after a long day's hike. Finding the sweet spot between carrying extra goodies but not too much weight is the goal.

Here are the foods we bring, along with recommendations from trusted fellow backpackers.

Breakfast: granola and powdered milk. Others we know take instant oatmeal and dried fruit. We also live on instant coffee — funny how it tastes great at 7,000 feet.

Lunch: Hard to improve on tried-and-true basics: Granola bars with apple slices. OK, apples are not smart weight-wise, but I like the juiciness of an apple with a granola bar so they're a concession. We used to make trail mix (peanuts, chocolate chips and raisins) but these days we buy it in bulk. Newbies: Be wary of carrying chocolate, which can melt, though M&M's and other candy-coated chocolate are safer. Avoid cheese, which gets gummy. We also bring lemon-honey cough drops to suck on.

Dinner: Our more purist hiker friends think freeze-dried food is too bland and pricey, but we've enjoyed one particular dish for years: Mountain Home's Long Grain and Wild Rice Pilaf. I add spring onions, mushrooms, sweet pepper and parsley, all of which keep for a couple of days if stored in the shade, and salt and pepper. The pilaf yields a generous amount for two people and at $6.95 doesn't break the bank. With it, we eat tough German-style bread or tortillas, which don't crush. The pilaf cooks right in the bag, which saves cleaning the pot, and we eat it in repurposed plastic containers instead of heavy bowls. For dessert we bring crunchy (not soft and smashable) oatmeal cookies, which we also enjoy mid-afternoon with a cup of tea.

Another concession is red wine, decanted into a plastic bottle. I have a two-piece BPA-free acrylic wine glass from GSI Outdoors, the base of which twists off and snaps into the bowl for packing. The wine tastes great with dinner as we sit on a rock overlooking an alpine lake and watching the light fade. Barry also brings Jägermeister for a late-night treat as he looks up at the stars.

Those in my backpacking circle swear by packaged cooked rice, beans or curry; dehydrated curried lentil soup (available at either North Coast Co-op); any Tasty Bite package of Asian cuisine; chili mix; flavored couscous or high-quality ramen with dried beans and veggies in it. And peanut butter in powder form, which is better than you expect. Some whip up pesto and burritos with dehydrated herbs and beans.

If you bring enough, any food tastes good after a long hike. And the pizza and beer you enjoy back down in Willow Creek may taste even better.

Pool Rules

Tips for tidepooling this summer

By Megan Bender
getout@northcoastjournal.com

Humboldt County beaches cannot just be visited, they must be experienced. And getting up close with marine life in tide pools should be at the top of this summer's to-do list. Here are some tips on doing it right.

Whether it's Indian Beach, Palmer's Point or Luffenholtz, we've got prime tide pools to explore. Attention newcomers: Before you hop in the car with a blanket or towel and tan-ready clothes, stop and reconsider. This is a different kind of beach experience and if it's your first time, you'll want to go prepared.

Plan ahead

Tide pooling requires you to get a little wet and a little dirty. When the intertidal zone is exposed, so are slimy rocks and pools. Wear rain boots and old jeans or pants you're not super fond of. Same goes for a shirt or jacket — pick something comfortable and fit for wet, rocky areas.

Once you're dressed, look up the tides on a site like www.willyweather.com for your beach of choice. The best time to visit tide pools is when the chart shows a very low or negative number. Negative numbers, indicating heights that fall below the average low water mark, are better for tide pooling.

Low tide times can vary so make sure you pick a time that works for you — low tide at 6:30 a.m. isn't going to fit your plans for an afternoon visit.

Tide pool etiquette

One of the most important things a beginning tide pooler should remember is that these pools are actually tiny homes.

Scripps Institution of Oceanography research associate Macey Rafter said it's important to realize these animals and organisms do not want to be disturbed. She said when it comes to experiencing a tide pool, it's better to "take pictures, not the animals." In other words: Look, don't touch.

As tempting as it might be to pick up the nearest starfish or hermit crab, avoid touching the tide pool animals. Avoid overturning rocks to expose crabs and other animals, too.

As fascinating or cool as these animals or organisms may look, you're a visitor. When they are touched or moved, it creates stress. And again, watch your step. A loose rock can be a hazard to you but a home to creatures. Be cautious to avoid being hurt or hurting the tide pool ecosystem.

Don't forget to clean up after yourself. If you need to dispose of any trash or waste, make sure you take it with you. If you wouldn't litter at your home, don't litter in theirs.

What you'll find

Though water temperature and location will affect what kind of creatures and organisms you'll find, most tide pools will house similar species.

The most common are different types of starfish, sea anemones and crabs. While I was exploring, I came across striped shore crabs and a ton of hermit crabs. Though the hermit crabs are everywhere, finding the other crabs can be tricky. They scatter at the sight and sound of you. But if you're observant and examine a pool long enough or catch a glimpse between some rocks, you'll find some well-camouflaged eyes peeking out at you.

When exploring, be especially alert for the starfish in the area. Not all of them are bright like the dermasteria, or leather star. Some are cleverly colored ochre starfish or purple starfish. They blend in remarkably well with the rocks and are easy to miss. Some purple starfish are actually orange, so look out for those, too.

With some patience you'll catch a glimpse of most of these creatures without overturning rocks.

Favorite beaches

With the help of a friend and Arcata resident Isaac Winans, I visited three beaches roughly 15 to 20 minutes north of Arcata by car. After some thorough tide pooling, I ranked the beaches based on which had more creatures for tide pool beginners to see.

First place goes to Old Home (or Indian) Beach. Right next to Trinidad State Beach, this beach provided the most complete experience with its variety of pools and creatures. To get there, head into the town of Trinidad and get down to the water using the steps at Edwards and Trinity streets. Once you're there, head south down the beach toward the rocks.

Up next was Palmer's Point. Palmer's Point is in Patrick's Point State Park and the farthest away of the three. The pools were plentiful (though I discovered more in Indian Beach) and there's more to explore once you've had enough of the water here. This beach is about 10 minutes north of the town of Trinidad on U.S. Highway 101 and requires a fee for exploring the park. Bring $8 cash. Drive to the end of Palmer's Point Road to park and take the stairs down.

Third place goes to Luffenholtz Beach (1639 Trinidad Scenic Drive, Trinidad). Though beautiful as ever, these pools were a bit empty. However, along the road to Luffenholtz there are plenty of places to stop and climb down, and you may have better luck at another spot. This one may deserve a second visit. To get here, get off U.S. Highway 101 North at Westhaven Drive and take a left like you're going to the Moonstone Grill. At the split, take a right and be careful down the narrow road. Eventually you'll see several places to park. Pick one and carefully find your way down — it's steep.

Alternatives

The best part of tide pooling can be interacting and identifying the animals in the water. For explorers who want to touch, visit the Humboldt State University Telonicher Marine Laboratory (570 Ewing St., Trinidad). It has tide pools with creatures you can touch. ●

Bells, Banjos and Puppets

By Collin Yeo

music@northcoastjournal.com

As I write this from my friend's porch on a hot afternoon in the last week of June, my ears are met with the sweet sounds of summer. No, wait, that's just a rooster mindlessly screaming in the yard while it pecks around in the dry dirt for snacks. Meanwhile, spreading around me with the bird's mad shriek is the wind and the heat working in tandem to blast my skin with all the pleasant ambience of a steel mill. Why do people like this season again? Oh, never mind me and instead enjoy this mid-Mad River Festival and eve of the Humboldt Folklife Festival however you see fit.

Have a peaceful week.

Thursday

Smokestack Relics is a band made up of two multi-instrumentalist brothers, Cameron and Collin Webb, who play a sort of road running powerful brand of swamp rock — a genre known for its gritty and twangy troubadours usually from south of the Mason-Dixon line. These Webb boys hail from Golden, Colorado, but that doesn't put a hole in their pirogue, sound-wise. Don't take it from me. Go find out for yourself for free at the Logger Bar at 9 p.m.

Friday

Humboldt's finest Pink Floyd tribute band Money plays the Eureka Friday Night Market on Clarke Plaza this afternoon at 5 p.m. This free gig — not in the sky — will allow you ample ambling time to check out the various wares around you at the market while vibing out to analog verisimilitude of bygone sounds supreme.

Another cash-free show awaits you at 7 p.m. at the Eureka First United Methodist Church when Reno's Tintabulations Handbell Ensemble presents its concert program entitled Coming of Age. Ever wanted to see a real human version of a chromatic bell music box from the golden age of German and Swiss wind-up automaton engineering? Well here's your chance.

And finally, the spooky honky-tonk and bluegrass sounds of The Pine Hill Haints haunt the Logger Bar at 9 p.m. for a free one with support from fellow Arkam Records rock act The Invisible Teardrops. Viva!

Saturday

Tyger Byle bills itself as "Humboldt's pre-eminent jug-prog band." Having never seen the group live and so being deprived of all context I have absolutely no idea what that means. At all. However, I am told by local sources that it is a show worth checking out so maybe find out for yourself — for free — at the Logger Bar tonight at 9 p.m.

Speaking of Blue Lake, that town's best country cover band Barn Fire plays Humbrews tonight at 9:30 p.m. ($5). Featuring a heavy set of whoopers and weepers from the best of the outlaw country catalog, this is surely a fun time for all you good ol' boys and buffalo gals. Gritty folk act Dead Bird Sons opens.

Sunday

Wake up, wake up, wake up, it's the first of the month. No, Cleveland's finest rap vocalizers Bone Thugs isn't running through town today — sorry for the tease. However, you can catch a musical treasure from a little farther up north when Toronto banjoist and composer Jayme Stone brings his Lomax recordings-inspired act Jayme Stone's Folklife to the Arcata Playhouse at 7 p.m. for an evening of early Americana played like it was laid on wax yesterday ($15, $13 for Humboldt Folklife Society members).

Jayme Stone's Folklife plays the Arcata Playhouse at 7 p.m. on Sunday, July 1.

Monday

International Spanish folk touring act Sangre de Muerdago plays the Sanctuary tonight at 8 p.m. For a sliding scale fee of $10-$25, come enjoy the Galician-inspired sounds of the multi-instrumental acoustic act.

On the Bywater side of St. Claude Avenue in New Orleans is a quirky little two-story building with — if memory serves — red trim, peeling white paint and cast-iron fencing that made the structure look like a 3D Victorian playing card. It was called the Spellcaster Lodge and I sometimes biked there after work to catch a cool show in those beautiful pre-Katrina evenings of my much-abused youthful years. This was — and is after restoration — the headquarters of Quintron and Miss Pussy-cat, the married duo of mad genius music inventor Q and cool-as-can-be artiste and puppeteer Miss P. They will present their deliriously fun dance pomp and theater act to the lucky few who can get to the Mini-plex early and stuff the room. If this one doesn't sell out, you have failed yourselves, Humboldt. I will go even further and call it my inner sports writer's LOCK OF THE WEEK for best in show. At 8:30 p.m. ($10).

Tuesday

Music is often nothing if not the convergence of sound and stories so let's examine the latter half of that equation tonight. As part of the ongoing Mad River Festival, Dell'Arte presents its International Family

Series: Stories in the Tent. In a collaboration with the Mad River Union, Dell'Arte showcases five stories written by Humboldt County citizens and acted out by Dell'Arte players in the titular Pierson Big Hammer Tent in Blue Lake at 7:30 p.m. (free).

Wednesday (Independence Day)

Forks Lounge in Willow Creek hosts its weekly Wednesday free acoustic jam with host Jimi Jeff at 7:30 p.m. And just like that, I have captured another Pokémon by including a Willow Creek gig in the mix for the first time. Huzzah.

Whomp Whomp Wednesday at The Jam is featuring a Path to Northern Nights featuring Sebastopol's deep bass act Shlump supported by similarly minded electro-clashers SuDs and Mike iLL at 9:30 p.m. ($20/$15 advance). Will the deep grooves overpower the firework blasts from the bombs bursting in air? Check it out.

Full show listings in the Journal's Music and More grid, the Calendar and online. Bands and promoters, send your gig info, preferably with a high-res photo or two, to music@northcoastjournal.com.

Ooh, la la la. And a few more Lalas ... Round up your posse or make it a hot date night and head to Bear River Casino Resort Saturday, June 30 at 9 p.m. for the Los Angeles-based Lalas Burlesque Show. The ladies of L.A. deliver an evening of ribald humor, dance and audience interactivity ($50 table for two, $95 table for four).

Hey kids, stay ON the grass at the Pierson Park Summer Block Party Thursday, July 5 from 5:30 to 7:30 p.m. at Pierson Park every Thursday through Aug. 30 (free). Bring your family and friends for a fun summer night in McKinleyville with live music, good times and good old-fashioned lawn games.

Set It Off

Celebrate the day that 13 little colonies said yes, we can and signed the Declaration of Independence from Great Britain. Humboldt's Fourth of July festivities are plentiful — we've got parades, barbecues, festivals and fireworks. Here's where to tip your star-spangled hat.

The Friendly City does everyone a solid by starting the festivities a day early. The Fortuna Fireworks Festival is Tuesday, July 3 from 5:30 to 8:30 p.m. at Newburg Park. The park will have arts and crafts vendors, music, a light show, barbecue and fireworks at dusk (free admission, $5 kids activity wristbands, barbecue $10, $5 kids). Parking is available in McLean Field for a $5 donation.

Party all day on Wednesday, July 4 at Arcata Plaza at the Fourth of July Jubilee from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. (free). As always, Arcata's oldest-running festival offers lively and diverse music, the Bubbles Parade, arts and crafts booths, and a kids' zone featuring a dunk tank, skate ramps, face painting and bean bag toss. This year the Humboldt Crabs will be signing autographs at 11 a.m. Expect more fun with break-dancing and Jiu Jitsu demos, aerial performances and lots of festive food. And what would the fourth be without baseball? The Crabbies host the Solano Mudcats at 2:30 p.m. at the Arcata Ballpark ($9, $6 seniors/students, $4 kids).

A little farther south, Old Town's Fourth of July Festival delivers five city blocks packed with more than 100 vendors, classic cars, kids' activities, firetrucks, food and drinks, and loads of live music from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. (free). There you can hop aboard a historic 1940s Crew Speeder Car and ride it down by the waterfront from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. ($5, $4 seniors, $3 ages 3-10, free for kids under 2). And don't miss the spectacular fireworks as they boom, crack and sizzle over the bay starting at 10 p.m. (free).

Check out the Norman Rockwell scene at the Fourth of July Parade and Fire Truck Rides from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m. on Main Street, Ferndale (free). Volunteer firefighters celebrate independence with shiny engine rides for kids from 10 a.m. to noon. Plus a small-town parade down Main Street.

What's poppin' in Southern Humboldt? Spend the day picnicking with your family at the tables and barbecues at the Benbow Lake State Recreation Area, then look up to the sky and see the Fourth of July Fireworks Show at dark around 9:30 p.m. (free to watch, $8 per car day use parking). Also, Fourth of July in Miranda is a town-wide event with its kids' zone, food, live music, non-alcoholic drinks by KMUD, a petting zoo, parade and a marble hunt (free admission).

One last word, revelers. Don't let patriotic become idiotic — have fun but be respectful of veterans, animals and people who don't enjoy having the living daylight scared out of them by illegal fireworks. Keep your pets safe and sound in your house.

From Another Time

Jurassic fun and Schrader's intensity

Reviews

JURASSIC WORLD: FALLEN KINGDOM.

Color me ... skeptical but I had reservations. I know, I know, I'm not leading with my customary font of optimism but rest easy, there's something coming about a drunk minister wrestling with suicide a little later.

I've enjoyed more than my share of Jurassic entertainment. In younger, simpler days I devoured the Michael Crichton book, which tempered my relish for Spielberg's version (1993). I skipped the next couple of movie sequels, as Crichton's The Lost World left me with the feeling it had been written exclusively for adaptation to the screen. It seemed like he'd sold out (he probably had about two decades before it occurred to me). Jurassic World (2015) therefore took me by surprise, with director Colin Trevorrow paying (maybe excessive) homage to Spielberg's visual style with a blockbuster of his own. That installment eschewed some of the clever story and tension building that have given the original (and almost everything in the Spielberg canon) its staying power, trading instead on the convincing relationship between its somewhat unlikely co-leads (Bryce Dallas Howard and Chris Pratt) and ever-escalating dino action. I liked the movie more than I expected but it also struck me as emblematic of the problems of cinema as global commerce, the death of creativity in popular art and all the dire harbingers of impending doom I so frequently read in the tea leaves of a pleasant afternoon at the movies.

Jurassic World didn't leave much story untold; it could have ended there and I'm not sure anybody would complain. So when trailers emerged for this follow-up, I got my guard up. But really, what's the point anymore? (There we are. Settling in again.) As Jurassic World: Fallen Kingdom started up, I had to stop all my mournful forecasts and pronouncements and just watch the thing. And I liked it.

A few years after the catastrophic events that shuttered Jurassic World, Isla Nublar remains uninhabited but for dinosaurs. Unfortunately for said dinosaurs, the island's long dormant volcano has awoken, assuring a swift and violent demise to any living thing within its reach. Claire Dearing (Howard), now leading a nonprofit dinosaur advocacy group, is summoned to the estate of Benjamin Lockwood (James Cromwell), erstwhile business partner of the late John Hammond (see: Jurassic Park). Lockwood's foundation has been secretly developing an alternate refuge for the dinosaurs and a plan. That plan hinges, of course, on Claire's knowledge of the park's infrastructure and systems. It also involves her favorite rugged animal behaviorist Owen Grady (Pratt), now contentedly building himself a cabin with a view of the Rocky Mountains.

It's no spoiler revealing that she convinces him. She brings two of her volunteers, neurotic systems analyst Franklin Webb (Justice Smith) and paleo-veterinarian Zia Rodriguez (Daniella Pineda) and good intentions. Upon the ragtag group's arrival on the island, though, they must contend with stampeding vestiges of the ancient world, hair-trigger mercenaries, a benefactor's questionable motives and a rapidly declining environment.

It's a lot, but director J.A. Bayona (The Impossible) carries it off with aplomb, relying more on the feeling and urgency of Spielberg's early, pioneering blockbusters than on their aesthetic as Trevorrow did. He incorporates classic horror elements while elevating the action (including a perfectly executed underwater escape) and establishing the secondary cast as real people with something at stake. It's easy to dismiss Fallen Kingdom as a big, dumb blockbuster but it's smarter than that. With subtle nods to its predecessors and its balance of humor, horror and heart, it's better and more compelling than it need be. PG13. 128M. BROADWAY, FORTUNA, MILL CREEK, MINOR.

FIRST REFORMED. Paul Schrader, both a legend of American cinema and a tragic signpost of its problems, is a prickly character whose stock in trade for 40 years has been the despair and violence dwelling together in the American male psyche. The product of a Calvinist upbringing, he famously didn't see a movie until he was 17. A few years later, he broke everybody's brain with the screenplay for Taxi Driver (1976). A torrent of brilliant, troubling screenwriting followed, then a string of beautiful, deeply nuanced movies he also directed — his run from Blue Collar (1978) through Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters (1985) could be a strong career. His output has been spottier since, whether due to his intractable nature or the art-eschewing nature of his industry.

When dudes tell me to smile.

First Reformed finds Schrader in classic form, with a distilled, minutely imagined portrait of Reverend Ernst Toller (Ethan Hawke, rawer than I've ever seen him), a former Army chaplain who has essentially become the caretaker of a sparsely attended, 250-year-old New York church. He's plagued by a stomach ailment, he drinks too much and doubts himself. Before long he's brought into the orbit of a troubled young couple (Amanda Seyfried and Philip Ettinger) and begins fatalistic meditation on the crisis of climate change, in which he begins to see a long-lost, likely misplaced sense of purpose.

The movie moves with a deliberate, novelistic intensity, forgoing exciting turns for authenticity and nuance of character. Shot in a full-frame digital format that emphasizes the austere verticality of the architecture, it marries style and subject perfectly. The result is frequently off-putting and not easily forgotten; vintage Schrader, in other words, an old master at work. R. 113M. MINOR.

Free Will Astrology

Week of June 28, 2018

By Rob Breznsky

freewillastrology@freewillastrology.com

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Your best ideas and soundest decisions will materialize as if by magic while you're lounging around doing nothing in a worry-free environment. So please make sure you have an abundance of relaxed slack and unhurried grace. Treat yourself to record-setting levels of comfort and self-care. Do whatever's necessary for you to feel as safe as you have ever felt. I realize these prescriptions might ostensibly clash with your fiery Aries nature. But if you meditate on them for even two minutes, I bet you'll agree they're exquisitely appropriate for you right now.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): "It is always what is under pressure in us, especially under pressure of concealment — that explodes in poetry." Taurus poet Adrienne Rich wrote that in an essay about the poet Emily Dickinson. She was describing the process of tapping into potent but buried feelings so as to create beautiful works of literature. I'm hoping to persuade you to take a comparable approach: to give voice to what's under pressure inside you, but in a graceful and constructive way that has positive results.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Introductory offers are expiring. The bracing thrills of novelty must ripen into the cool enjoyments of maturity. It's time to finish the dress rehearsals so the actual show can begin. You've got to start turning big, bright fantasies into crisp, no-nonsense realities. In light of these shifting conditions, I suspect you can no longer use your good intentions as leverage, but must deliver more tangible signs of commitment. Please don't take this as a criticism, but the cosmic machinery in your vicinity needs some actual oil, not just your witty stories about the oil and the cosmic machinery.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): In the coming weeks, you will have an excellent chance to dramatically decrease your Wimp Quotient. As the perilously passive parts of your niceness toughen up, I bet you will encounter brisk possibilities that were previously off-limits or invisible to you. To ensure you remain in top shape for this delightful development, I think you should avoid entertainment that stimulates fear and pessimism. Instead of watching the latest flurry of demoralizing stories on Netflix, spend quality time summoning memories of the times in your life when you were unbeatable. For extra credit, pump your fist ten times each day as you growl, "Victory is mine!"

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): It's not so bad to temporarily lose your bearings. What's bad is not capitalizing on the disruption that caused you to lose your bearings. So I propose that you regard the fresh commotion as a blessing. Use it as motivation to initiate radical changes. For example, escape the illusions and deceptions that caused you to lose your bearings. Explore unruly emotions that may be at the root of the superpowers you will fully develop in the future. Transform yourself into a brave self-healer who is newly receptive to a host of medicinal clues that were not previously accessible.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Here's my list of demands: 1. Avoid hanging out with people who are unreceptive to your influence. 2. Avoid hanging out with people whose influence on you is mediocre or dispiriting. 3. Hang out with people who are receptive to your influence and whose influence on you is healthy and stimulating. 4. Influence the hell out of the people who are receptive to your influence. Be a generous catalyst for them. Nudge them to surpass the limits they would benefit from surpassing. 5. Allow yourself to be deeply moved by people whose influence on you is healthy and stimulating.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): "If I didn't define myself for myself, I would be crunched into other people's fantasies for me and eaten alive." Activist author Audre Lorde said that, and now, in accordance with your current astrological and psychological needs, I'm offering it to you. I realize it's a flamboyant, even extreme, declaration, but in my opinion, that's what is most likely to motivate you to do the right thing. Here's another splashy prompt, courtesy of philosopher Jean-Paul Sartre: "We only become what we are by the radical and deep-seated refusal of that which others have made us."

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): André René Roussimoff, also known as André the Giant, was a French actor and professional wrestler. He was 7 feet, 4 inches tall and weighed 520 pounds. As you might imagine, he ate and drank extravagantly. On one festive occasion, he quaffed 119 bottles of beer in six hours. Judging from your current astrological indicators, Scorpio, I suspect you may be ready for a binge like that. JUST KIDDING! I sincerely hope you won't indulge in such wasteful forms of "pleasure." The coming days should be a time when you engage in a focused pursuit of uplifting and healthy modes of bliss. The point is to seek gusto and amusement that enhance your body, mind, and soul.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): On her 90th birthday, my Great-Aunt Zosia told me, "The best gift you can give your ego is to make it see it's both totally insignificant and totally important in the cosmic scheme of things." Jenna, my girlfriend when I was 19, was perhaps touting a similar principle when, after teasing and tormenting me for two hours, she scrawled on my bathroom mirror in lipstick, "Sometimes you enjoy life better if you don't understand it." Then there's my Zen punk friend Arturo, who says that life's goodies are more likely to flow your way if you "hope for nothing and are open to everything." According to my analysis of the astrological rhythms, these messages will help you make the most of the bewildering but succulent opportunities that are now arriving in your vicinity.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): In accordance with the astrological beacons, I have selected two pieces of advice to serve as your guiding meditations during the next seven weeks. You might want to write them on a piece of paper that you will carry in your wallet or pocket. Here's the first, from businessman Alan Cohen: "Only those who ask for more can get more, and only those who know there is more, ask." Here's the second, from writer G. K. Chesterton: "We need to be happy in this wonderland without once being merely comfortable."

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Ecologists in Mexico City investigated why certain sparrows and finches use humans' discarded cigarette butts in building their nests. They found that cellulose acetate, a chemical in the butts, protects the nests by repelling parasitic mites. Is there a metaphorical lesson you might draw from the birds' ingenious adaptation, Aquarius? Could you find good use for what might seem to be dross or debris? My analysis of the astrological omens says that this possibility is worth meditating on.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): I suspect that sometime soon you will come into possession of an enchanted potion or pixie dust or a pouch full of magic beans — or the equivalent. If and when that occurs, consider the following protocols: 1. Before you use your new treasure, say a prayer to your higher self, requesting that you will be guided to use it in such a way as to make yourself wiser and kinder. 2. When you use it, be sure it harms no one. 3. Express gratitude for it before and during and after using it. 4. Use it in such a way that it benefits at least one other person or creature in addition to you. 5. See if you can use it to generate the arrival or more pixie dust or magical beans or enchanted potion in the future. 6. When you use it, focus on wielding it to get exactly what you want, not what you sort of want or temporarily want. ●

TESS the Planet Hunter

(Part 1 of 2)

By Barry Evans

fieldnotes@northcoastjournal.com

Sitting in the cavernous nose of a SpaceX Falcon 9 rocket, NASA's TESS was launched on April 18 from Cape Canaveral. By the time you read this, TESS — Transiting Exoplanet Survey Satellite — will be starting its initial two-year, all-sky survey. TESS's mission is to detect planets orbiting comparatively nearby stars in our Milky Way galaxy, out to about 100 light years. (The Milky Way is about 100,000 light years across.) Astronomers estimate that TESS will at least double the tally of confirmed exoplanets, or planets orbiting stars other than our sun, currently numbering about 4,000.

Why TESS?

TESS is a logical follow-up to NASA's dying Kepler Space Telescope (launched in 2009) and precursor to NASA's flagship $10 billion James Webb Space Telescope (JWST, scheduled for launch in 2020). Kepler was essentially a proof-of concept mission: Could a space telescope detect the presence of distant planets by measuring tiny dips in a star's brightness as the planets transits (passes in front of) the star? It sure could; Kepler detected thousands of exoplanets up to 3,000 light years away in a patch of sky just 1/400th the area of the entire cosmos. However, these planetary finds are mostly too distant for further investigation and too large to harbor life. TESS, on the other hand, is optimized to search for smaller, brighter and comparatively nearby planets.

The best way to think about TESS is as a finderscope (that's the "survey" in its name), identifying Earth-like planets for detailed examination by the JWST and others. TESS will survey almost the entire sky over the next two years, taking a month to image each of 26 Orion-constellation-size swaths. The 15 percent of sky not included in this primary mission will be covered later.

Elegant Orbit

Of all TESS' many remarkable features, I think the most interesting is its eccentric 13.7-day orbit (half a lunar month). TESS will fly out as far as the moon's orbit (apogee) and then back to swing around the Earth (perigee). This orbit is quite tricky to acquire, taking nearly two months, including a lunar gravity assist and burning up about 40 percent of the mission's scanty $200 million budget in the process. The genius of this previously untried orbit is that it's super-stable — no course corrections needed for decades! — due to the fact that when TESS is at apogee (at 59 Earth radii) it will be out of phase with the moon by 90 degrees. This means that the moon's gravity will be acting on TESS from one direction for about two weeks and from the other direction for the next two weeks, with the one effectively canceling out the other.

The advantages of this elegant orbit compared to, for example, the Hubble Space Telescope, which is in a low Earth orbit of 340 miles, include:

Most of the time, TESS will be sufficiently far from Earth to allow for 300-hour unbroken observations;

TESS will be far enough out to avoid any stray light from the Earth and moon, or radiation from Earth's Van Allen belts;

When it's closest to Earth at 17 Earth radii, TESS' speedy download rates of 100 megabits/second will allow for an efficient 4.5 hour, 200 gigabyte data-dump every two weeks.

Next time we'll look at how we detect exoplanets and, once found, how we can probe them for possible signs of life.

Barry Evans (barryevans9@yahoo.com) marvels that in 26 years, we've gone from zero to several thousand known exoplanets.
